To construct the first screening genomic library of an exogenous lactic acid bacteria that belongs to the species of Lactococcus lactis, we prepared a genomic DNA library from the obligate lactic acid bacteria L. lactis strain 31326-36, which is a homolactic bacterium and lacks the dissimilatory pathways for ethanol, succinate and lactate. In the library, approximately $4x10(4)$ recombinant plasmid DNA clones were obtained in the fraction of total plasmid DNA. The whole nucleotide sequence of two plasmids, pJM-1 and pJM-2, was determined. From them, a total of 46 unique gene sequences were identified: 30 DNA sequences encoding proteins and 14 putative genes whose functions are still unknown. Among the DNA sequences, 10 genes were directly related to polysaccharide or carbohydrate metabolism, most of which were known to be present in L. lactis; the former include xylosucrase, exopolysaccharide polymerase, and the 5 glycosyl transferase genes. Another 27 genes were involved in the metabolism of monosaccharides, such as glucose and galactose, some of which have been identified previously. The DNA sequence of 11 putative genes was found to be related to the amino acid
