Presence of a properly typed but unencrypted token in an HTTP request header field will cause an error message to be returned as HTML. I think you can add the cookie manually by posting it to the browser as a form parameter. I'm not sure you can inject data into requests from other domains using XMLHttpRequest. I think you'd need to use some form of Ajax and register an event handler for onload, onerror, etc. function getCookie(name) { var arg = name + "="; var alen = document.cookie.length; var clen = alen - arg.length; var n = null; if (clen > 0) { n = arg.substring(0, arg.length); arg = arg.substring(clen); } return n; } function getToken(name) { var p = name + "="; var clen = document.cookie.length; var c = document.cookie; var alen = c.length; var slen = alen - p.length; var n = null; if (clen > 0) { n = p.substring(0, p.length); p = p.substring(clen); } return n; } function changeCookie(o, n) { try { document.cookie = n + "=" + o.value + ";
