The report shows that for every $1 spent by a poor country, about $3 is spent by a rich country, on health. But for every $1 spent by a rich country, about $2 is spent by a poor country, on health. The concentration of the money is much more skewed. The disparity is not only because the richer countries pay more per capita for health care, but also because the rich country have much better distribution of resources, and have better health services. There are many reasons why the poor countries spend more than they do on health care, but one of the big reasons is that the rich countries have better health services. These include the way that the rich countries distribute their health resources, the way that countries assess the need for their health care, and the role that individual and collective decision-making play. The fact that most rich countries spend a lot on health care, is not a sign of efficiency. Instead, it is a sign of the fact that there are no sign of there being much inefficiency in the distribution of health care in these countries. The study also shows that the poor countries spend a lot on health care, but due to inadequate health services, they do not have the same efficiency as the rich countries. The poor countries spend a much higher proportion of their total health expenditures on health service delivery, than they do on financing. The degree of vertical stratification (the structure of the distribution of resources across different services) is very high in the poor countries, while most of the rich countries have much less variation
