This is the official link for the Golden Record Vinyl to CD Converter software for. 3D-printed display system A display system 3D-printed to allow single use of plastic camera plates, demonstrating holographic image synthesis in commercial quality. Holographic display Developed by the National Research Council's Institute of Biomaterials and Bioengineering (IBB) of Canada, this system is designed to decrease the cost of making holographic images. 3D printer The method uses an inkjet printer to deposit light-sensitive organic monomers on to the surface of clear plastic, like polyethylene terephthalate (PET) used to make clear containers. The technique draws from a technique first conceived by a team at the IBG in 2010, and demonstrated it could synthesise holographic images for smartphone cameras, a prototype system with a resolution equivalent to a 4K television. It also demonstrated a 30-micrometre square display for handheld devices. Future technology In a press release issued after the IBB paper was published in Scientific Reports, the researchers said their system could use 3D printing to make holographic displays for "traditional photography, beyond the resolution and convenience of smartphones. "Thanks to the high resolution of the holographic images and the added functionality of holographic displays, the display system can be used for a wide variety of applications, including industry, education, architecture, entertainment, security, forensics and medicine."
